

HOME / NATION

Childhood lost: ‘Sometimes I feel like time has stopped’

Shayma Assaad, 22, is now a mother of four, after being brought to Syria by her family as a teen.

By ELLEN WHINNETT

12:00AM JULY 16, 2022

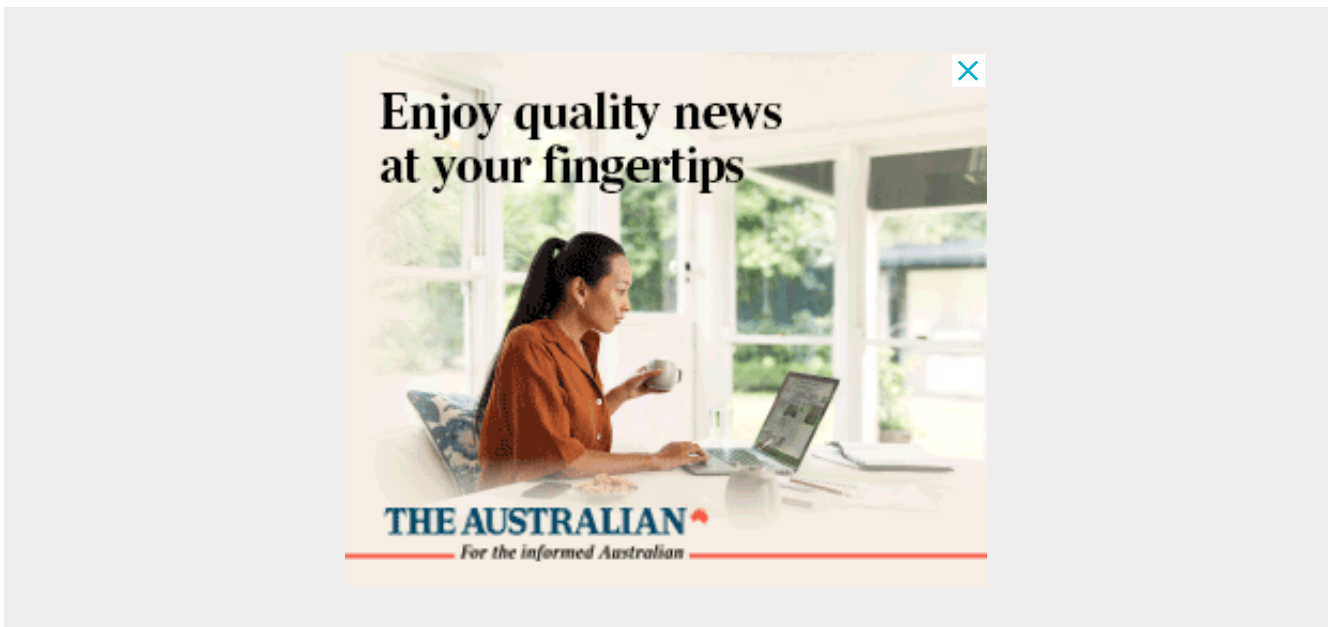

Shayma Assaad was 15 years old when her parents took her and her two little sisters from Sydney to Syria.

There, she found herself living in Raqqa, the Syrian capital of the Islamic State caliphate, where she was “married” to a Sydney man seven years older than her, and had her first baby at the age of 16.

Now 22, she has four children, and has spent the past three years detained in the prison camps housing Islamic State families in the desert in northeastern Syria.

She tries to describe a future for her family, and tells how she struggled to homeschool her children in a tent, given she had barely finished Year 9 in high school before she was taken from Australia.

“It’s actually really hard,” she tells The Weekend Australian in an interview on a 44C day inside the al-Roj camp in Kurdish-controlled Syria, near the Iraqi border.

The Al-Roj camp in Syria

“Sometimes I feel like time has stopped. Living in a 4 x 4 tent and your child waking up in the night telling you he can’t breathe from the heat, that’s actually really hard.

“And I can’t really let them outside because this is the only sort of shade we have,” she says, gesturing to the metre or so of shade cast by the cement wall of a tiny communal kitchen.

The plight of Shayma Assaad is one of the most troubling of the group of women and children held in al-Roj camp. She was just a child herself when she was taken to Syria, and now has four children under seven: sons Alaa, 6, Dawood, 5, Umayr, 4, and little Mariam, 3, who was born in the camp and has never taken a step outside her wire compound.

Her husband, former Sydney tradie Mohammed Noor Masri, is in prison several hours away in Hasakah, where he has been held incommunicado for more than three years.

Her mother Bessima and little sisters Assya, 15, and Maysa, 12, are in the tent next door. All were taken into custody by the Syrian

Democratic Forces at Baghouz in March 2019.

Her father Ahmad Assaad is in prison near Hasakah. He has previously claimed he only took the family to Syria in an effort to rescue two of his sons, and that they inadvertently became “stuck” in Islamic State territory.

Ms Assaad’s husband, former tradie Mohammed Noor
Masri, left Sydney to join Islamic State in 2016.

Ms Assaad, 151cm tall, emotional and in tears as she speaks, told how her youngest child, three-year-old daughter Mariam, was born at the notoriously dangerous al-Hol camp, near Hasakah.

This article contains content that is only available in the web version. Open the web version

“Mariam was born in the camp, in Hol. She was actually born in a tent, not a hospital. She was born two o’clock in the morning in a tent with no doctor support at all,” Ms Assaad said.

“We had a neighbour, she had a bit of experience with delivering children, she was our only hope. We had to actually ask her for help so she came to my rescue.”

The Australian families were moved to the safer al-Roj camp two years ago, in the Syrian oilfields in a remote part of the country close to the Iraqi border.

IS Members Surrender as Syrian Prison Recaptured, Kurdish-Led Forces Say

In winter it freezes and snow falls on their tent, which is heated with a kerosene heater. In summer, it routinely hits more than 45C during the day.

“It’s actually a risk for them to stay in the tent because fires are caused by electricity,” Ms Assaad said of her children.

“It is also a risk of them going out in the sun and burning. As you can see, my daughter’s turned black from the sun. The days here are actually really long, hard. You have to struggle for water. Every 48 tents there’s a fence, as you can see. Schooling is hard as well because children get scared to go to school.”

The Australians largely keep their children out of the rudimentary school on the other side of al-Roj camp and try to teach them in their tents.

“It’s what we give them, what I teach my sons ... how to read,” Ms Assaad said.

“I barely knew. I left school at Year 9. I didn’t even start Year 10 when I left school.”

Like other occupants of the camp, Ms Assaad gets a two-minute window once a week to send messages to Australia via a WhatsApp messaging service monitored by the camp administration.

Shayma Assaad’s four young children Alaa, 6, Dawood, 5, Umayr, 4, and Mariam, 3. Picture: Ellen Whinnett/The Australian

“I would really love to go back to Australia. I want my kids to get a better education, to live like a normal child. To know what life is beyond the fences,” she said.

Asked if she posed a threat to the people of Australia, she replied: “No, of course not!

“I want to study again, I want to finish my education. One thing I regret is not finishing, not being able to finish my education. I would have been able to give my kids more than I gave them.

“For them, everything they missed out on, I want them to have. A normal childhood, the education, going to the park, the circus, going to the movie, everything a kid would love to do. Going to a shopping centre and being able to buy what they want.”

She asked the Australian government to consider that “every day that we spend here, we can never get back. I want them to have mercy on us and the children,” she said.

Related stories

- Islamic State’s grand plan for squalid ‘camp terror’
- Isis camp ‘more inhumane than Guantanamo’

Read Comments

READ NEXT

Pandemic payments back on the table

SARAH ISON, STEPHEN LUNN, JESS MALCOLM

PM Anthony Albanese appears set to reinstate the payments at a national cabinet meeting today after criticism over his response to the latest surge in Covid cases.

Bush town at war with itself

AMOS AIKMAN

Outside the shop at the heart of Wadeye, a sign proclaims ‘no violence’. You could be forgiven for thinking no one reads it.

Islamic State’s grand plan for squalid, dangerous ‘camp terror’

ELLEN WHINNETT

Defeated terror group Islamic State wants to establish a new caliphate, and the teeming al-Hol detention camp in Syria, home to 60,000 women and children, is at the heart of its ambitions.

Islamic fate: the lost heirs of Aussie terror

ELLEN WHINNETT

Pressure is mounting on the PM to repatriate Australian women and children held in camps for Islamic State families in Syria, amid fears their indefinite detention is leading to a national security disaster.

More foolishness on the menu at Virgin

YONI BASHAN, CHRISTINE LACY

Virgin chief Jayne Hrdlicka was spotted in the royal box at Wimbledon and that’s sure to have annoyed those who have had to suffer the ignominy of being grounded by cancellations.

Subscribe for full access
THE AUSTRALIAN

^ Back to top

THE AUSTRALIAN
FOR THE INFORMED AUSTRALIAN

Chinese Site

The Australian Plus member benefits

Sign up to Newsletters

Manage Your Newsletters

Contact Us

Help

The Australian app

